CANONICAL SOURCE - VERBATIM

Hemophilia is a deficiency due to improper assimilation of the elements which are necessary to build vital energies in the glands, and their functions in the body, including proper coagulation of blood and ability to build walls of blood vessels.

This deep-seated, but correctable ailment can be inherited or developed. The defects might be removed by a process involving a vibratory device provided in consultation. This will constructively effect the lacteal duct center, the largest Peyers patch, an area important for control of assimilation which also indirectly controls circulation.

Therapy is to return the body to normal function:

Consistent application of vibratory device (provided) which makes for proper glandular activity, not adding or attempting to make the chemical reactions but providing the substrate for better activity in coordination of glands, organs, and lacteal duct.
